The Amazon / Whole Foods Retail Food Distribution Center Network in the United States

Amazon acquired Whole Foods in August, 2017 and by extension took ownership of the Whole Foods retail grocery distribution network. The existing Whole Foods distribution network is largely focused on Perishables merchandise for its retail stores in each major market region being serviced as documented below.

The Amazon Prime Now / Fresh Hub Network in the United States

In late 2014, Amazon launched a rapid build-out of a distribution network consisting of smaller footprint urban distribution buildings positioned close to the centers of large metropolitan cities across the country. Amazon's Prime Now Hubs are typically stocked with the highest velocity items that are popular such as bottled water. These facilities only stock a limited line of products (e.g. 15,000 different items) to enable Amazon Prime Now members to place orders for this merchandise and receive rapid delivery in as little as 60 minutes from the time of order placement. It is highly likely that this build-out will continue into the future as these buildings are the equivalent of retail stores for Amazon. Note that in the table below, if the square footage of the facility is set to zero then the operation is co-located in another building therefore we do not double-count the square footage.

The data concerning the Amazon Prime/Fresh network is challenging to track and this is the best information that is currently available.

The Amazon Receiving or Inbound Cross Dock (IXD) Network in the United States

Formerly referred to as redistribution centers, the inbound cross dock network has been developed by Amazon to streamline the flow of goods into the fulfillment center network. These facilities are similar to import distribution centers in that they are used as inventory receiving, break bulk and storage buffers for overseas import containers incoming from foreign vendors. After the goods have arrived at the ports, they are received into the IXD facility and held until such time that the fulfillment center needs to be replenished with inventory. Merchandise is aggregated into truckloads and then transported to the fulfillment center. These facilities are located near major ports to minimize inbound ground transportation expense from the port to the IXD facility. These facilities may also be used to store and replenish domestic goods.

The Amazon Regional "Middle Mile" Sortation Center Network in the United States

Amazon currently operates a network of regional sortation centers across the United States to increase control over the outbound transportation of packages within its own distribution network (for more detailed information about Amazon's sortation network click here). These buildings are key enablers to organizing outbound packages by region of the country and by carrier. The purpose of these facilities is to sort packages to pallets by zip code so that they can be transferred to an Air Hub (for out of region packages), or to an Amazon Delivery Station, or to the USPS post office that is responsible for the zip code. Packages being shipped by UPS are picked up directly at the fulfillment center and do not get processed by the Amazon sortation centers for the most part.

This system was introduced to the U.S. in 2014 and has been instrumental to Amazon taking greater control over its outbound shipping operations and expenses. Sortation centers are typically, but not always, standalone buildings within the Amazon Network. Sortation centers can handle packages for a regional area on behalf of one or more fulfillment centers.

The Amazon Air Gateway Network in the United States

Amazon currently operates a network of air gateway sortation centers across the United States. These facilities are typically located very close to airports being used to fly customer packages on Amazon Prime Air flights from one region of the country to another. At the air hub facilities, packages arrive from the nearby fulfillment center and they are placed into standard air cannisters that are loaded onto cargo planes late at night. The planes fly from each regional airport to the centroid of the country which is in Hebron, Kentucky where there is a central package sortation hub. The main hub sorts packages out by region and the planes are then loaded with packages for each of their respective regions such that they fly home with packages that were shipped from other Amazon Fulfillment Centers in the network. This is a hub and spoke system that is comprised of one central hub connected to 25 spokes whereby the spokes are various regional airports around the country. This is the foundation that enables Amazon to pick a customer order in Seattle and have it delivered to a customer in New York City within 1 - 2 days. As importantly, this is how Amazon can manage national package shipments with the Amazon Logistics platform rather than relying on UPS for FedEx for some (but not all) of their domestic shipping volume. As time goes by, Amazon is building out their Air Hub and Delivery Station networks to enable significantly increasing shipping volumes to be managed by Amazon rather than by third party carriers and needless to say, at a lower operating expense.

This massive logistics network is unique to Amazon in the sense that no other retailer in the world has developed such a concept quite simply because no other retailer has the scale to cost-effectively accomplish this logistics system. Looking ahead, without doubt, Amazon will build out a similar hub and spoke air network in Europe and the main hub will likely be located in the epicenter of the continent (e.g. close to Frankfurt Germany). This will enable a customer in Spain to receive an order picked in the United Kingdom within 24 - 48 hours of order placement. Looking further ahead, the connection of multiple air hubs will be next such that global markets can be connected and Amazon customers will be able to order products from other continents.

The Amazon "Last Mile" Delivery Station Network for Small Packages in the United States

In late 2013, Amazon launched a build-out of its delivery station distribution network for small packages consisting of smaller facilities that are typically in the 100,000 to 140,000 sq. ft. range. Later in 2017 Amazon initiated a roll-out of the same concept for heavy/bulky merchandise weighing 60 - 300 Lbs and requiring white glove service. We now break those facilities out into their own data table below this one.

These last mile delivery facilities are designed to service a 45-mile radius and they are typically positioned within larger metropolitan cities across the country although this is starting to change as these facilities are now being opened up in smaller market areas. The delivery station's primary role is to sort packages for outbound routes to enable last mile delivery to customers within a tightly defined urban area. Often deliveries are performed by Amazon Delivery Service Partners with the Amazon Sprinter vans (or by multiple local courier companies that are contracted by Amazon to service specific routes though this appears to be less prevalent in the U.S.) and also by independent Amazon Flex drivers. Note that in the table below, if the square footage of the facility is set to zero then the operation is co-located in another building therefore we do not double-count the square footage.

The data concerning this network is challenging to track so we provide the best information available within the table below.
